I may, as I hope, stand excused for my prolixity. CHAPTER VI. I Now resume my narrative, which, as the reader may perhaps remember, has not yet been brought beyond the middle of the year 1845. In the spring of that year I lost a kind patron, by the decease of the late Mr. Thomas Hood, the justly-celebrated author. To this gentleman I had been known for several years, during which time I had his full permission to wait upon him whenever I wished to do so. It was however but seldom that I could avail myself of this privilege, for a privilege it certainly was. When I could thus indulge myself, I invariably met with a most courteous and encouraging reception, both from himself and Mrs. Hood, and I shall not, I hope, ever cease gratefully to remember my honoured and kind friends....
